Justin guitar beatles songs

When The Beatles were recording the groundbreaking album Revolver, a strange thing happened in the annals of rock 'n' roll history. On the track Taxman, written and sung by George Harrison, Paul McCartney played guitar solo instead of George (guitarist of the band). In other bands, taking a solo from a lead guitarist would be unthinkable. (Imagine someone offering such a thing to Jimmy Page or Jimi Hendrix.) But for George, it wasn't the end of the world. Later, he even said he was pleased to have Paul solo on his song. There were several reasons for making George. First, he had enough on his mind trying to get the vocals and the rest of Taxman right. Meanwhile, he said he got so into the sitar he didn't really play much guitar last year. This shift in his thinking began when he became interested in Indian music. It all started when he played a sitar on a Beatles record - one of the first times the instrument was heard on a Western pop record. George's 1965 work on the Norwegian Tree became a defining feature for him. In the spring of 1965, George met a sitar who was a prop on set (and an instrument used in the soundtrack score). Soon after, he bought a sitar from a store in London and began messing with it. In the fall of that year, when the band was recording Rubber Soul, John Lennon asked George if he could play the riff Norwegian Wood on his sitar. George understood this, and the studio engineers christened him on top of the song's tracks. This record stood out on the rock scene of the mid-60s. While other bands tried to use oriental sounds in their recordings, the release of Fab Four Rubber Soul at the end of '65 showed one of the first authentic pieces of sitar ever heard on the western plate. It was such a mind-blowing that we had this weird instrument on the record, Ringo later said. And it changed the way George Harrison thought about music. George played a sitar on two tracks from the 1966 Revolver. On the first track, the band recorded John's haunting Tomorrow Never Knows - George played the sitar and tambourine in addition to the guitar. George had three of his own songs on Revolver, his high water mark on that front. On Love You To, the Beatles hit fans with a song that was entirely in Indian style. Again, George played sitar while other musicians played tabla and tambourine (in addition to another sitar). When it came time to make Sgt. Pepper's, George remained absorbed in Indian music. Within Without You, his only song on this record sounds Indian group group vocalist of the Beatles. On The White Album (1968), George Songs took a turn to return to pop style and Western instruments. He stayed that way for Abbey Road and much of George's solo work.
